OUR INTEREST IN KOREA.

How Success of Either Russia or Japan Would Affect America.
Honier B. Hulbert, in his "Korea, the Bone of Contention" in the May Century, says:

As Americans we naturally ask how the success of either side would affect our interests in the peninsula and in the whole far east. Japan stands for the "open door" everywhere, for perfect freedom of religion, for the opening up of the agricultural, mineral and industrial resources of the eastern world. Not one plank in her platform suggests a policy that would be inimical to American enterprise in any of its many forms. Americans have not done very much in Korea as yet, but this war means more than Korea. It means Manchuria and all northern China.

The Russian minister in Seoul recently told a journalist that the Russians did not see why Americans should be playing Japan's game since she is a commercial rival. He affirmed that Americans would be welcomed anywhere in Manchuria by the Russians today, but that if Mukden and the other ports were opened it would allow the influx of a thousand Japanese, and trouble would be inevitable. If this is so, how does it happen that American firms in Port Arthur, Dulay, Vladivostok and other Russian centers find it absolutely necessary to carry on their business through Russian agents? The local manager of the firm must be under Russian control or he can do no business. An independent American firm in Vladivostok recently found that it must close its doors. It would not come under Russian jurisdiction, and it soon found that when its goods from America arrived they were kept in the customs warehouse from four to six months before the authorities would release them.

In one respect the Americans would become more obnoxious to the Russians than the Japanese. The American merchant is always pushing for a leading place. He develops a large policy and seeks to become a commercial and financial power in whatever community he may be placed. On the other hand, the Japanese almost always push for the small retail trade. A hundred of them handle the same amount of goods that a single American or English firm handles.

An Elephant Nurse.
Miss Cunningham Graham tells of an elephant in Ceylon which actually assisted in the nursing at a hospital. When one of the patients dropped a pill the elephant picked it up and, placing it in the man's open mouth, blew it down his throat.
